

My philosophy

While the children are in my care, it is my responsibility to speak and act in ways that reassure them that they are important, safe, and cared for. This has significant impacts on their long-term development and their outlook to the world. If children feel secure and loved in their childhood, they will be able to love and care for others in the future.

Children learn best in different ways, through movement, creating, and imagining. I will join children enthusiastically as they play and learn. I will positively compliment them on their successes and development.

Children benefit from opportunities to explore the world with adults and other children. I will facilitate opportunities for children to play with peers as well as interacting with children myself.

Parents, grandparents, families and other caregivers are vital in the lives of children. I understand that families are different for each child and I will reflect this respectfully in my conversations. I will develop trusting relationships with families through regular communication.

I want children to know that I empathise with them when they are happy or sad. This is how trusting relationships are built. I want children to feel this is their second home, where they are loved and taken care of.
